Person 1: Have you ever seen things that seem to have life in real life?

Person 2: If I tell you, people might think I'm insane.

Person 1: We already know you're insane, but still, we'd love to hear your answer. What objects are you talking about?

Person 2: My first encounter would be with elements—water, fire, earth, cloud, and air.

Person 1: That's a bit hard to believe. Elements having life?

Person 2: Well, it's not completely accepting this; it may or may not. But let me give you some funny and sensitive answers.

Person 1: Sure, go ahead.

Person 2: The objects I'm referring to may not have life, but fortunately, they've saved a lot of lives.

Person 1: Really? What are those?

Person 2: Ambulance, injections, operating equipment, and blood.

Person 1: It sounds ridiculous, but for everything to operate, there should be a living being, a human, to make it work and save people. So, technically, it's not acceptable.

Person 2: What about blood? Is that considered a living being or an object?

Person 1: See, you're twisting the question; it's unfair.

Person 2: Okay, my last encounter would be us—human beings.

Person 1: Again, you're trying to twist the question. You're really making it hard to follow.

Person 2: No, I'm sure.

Person 1: Oh, really? We might have to accept that you're insane.

Person 2: But my answer might make sense.

Person 1: How?

Person 2: We humans, who believe in creation from the Bible, could accept me.

Person 1: I still don't get your point.

Person 2: "God made us from the sand as living beings." smiling
